

Attempts to circumvent Indiana's Do-Not-Call law are not welcome in my household. We have enjoyed the relative peace and quiet provided by this law, and do not desire to allow telemarketers to intrude in our privacy. While the First Amendment provides them with an undeniable right to speak, it does not guarantee them a captive audience. If they desire to hawk their wares in this manner, let them purchase time in the broadcast media or send their proposals via regular mail. If they have questions about accounts that I have with them, certainly that constitutes a "business relationship," and they should be free to call me during their regular business hours to discuss that, but the solicitation of new business is clearly outside that "business relationship," and is indefensible under Indiana's Do-Not-Call List law.
